1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a remote control system for controlling television set top boxes (TV STB) and the like and, more particularly, to a channel assigning and remotely operated channel selecting method and system for a broadcast receiving apparatus connected to a communication network and a broadcast receiving apparatus, which is connected to a local communication network, such as a public telephone network, thereby remotely controlling a TV STB. 2. Description of the Background Art In the prior art, when a viewer selects a channel and tunes in, a set top box for receiving a TV broadcast is set in front of a TV set (hereinafter, referred to as "tuner"), a remote control is operated to select the desired channel and the desired channel is tuned in by operating the set top box. In addition, when the viewer operates a remote control, the set top box may be remotely controlled and a viewer may control the set top box from the place where the viewer watches the TV. That is, the viewer should be located in front of the set top box where a cable to the set top box is connected. Thus, the cable must be laid at a predetermined place, and when the viewer operates the remote control, the desired channel is tuned in, thus leading to inconvenience. In addition, when a viewer uses a TV set connected to a public telephone network, an IP telephone or the like, it is difficult to remotely operate a set top box. That is, when the viewer uses the TV set connected to the public telephone network, a telephone number of the set top box must be input to the public telephone network. ### What's New in the?

Differential alterations of the blood proteome in juvenile onset parkinsonism. Subtle alterations of the blood proteome are associated with the development of idiopathic parkinsonism. To determine whether these changes are associated with disease progression, we quantified the plasma proteome of children with juvenile onset parkinsonism (JOP), and normal controls (NC). Abundance changes were identified using 1-dimensional polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis (PAGE) and combined with mass spectrometry and spectral counting to identify proteins and quantify relative quantities in multiple patient samples.

Forty-four proteins were identified that were differentially regulated in the serum samples of JOP patients. The majority of these changes appear to be induced by symptomatic treatments, and the magnitude of the alterations was small. With increasing disease duration, there were changes in the abundance of the transferrin receptor, transthyretin, alpha-1-antitrypsin, and ceruloplasmin, and the majority of these proteins appear to differentiate the progressive from the non-progressive disease course. Proteins reflecting neurodegeneration include alpha-synuclein, ubiquitin carboxyl-terminal hydrolase-L1, beta-amyloid, apolipoprotein D, and prion protein. Proteins reflecting inflammation, such as C-reactive protein and lipopolysaccharide-binding protein, were also differentially regulated. Disease duration and JOP treatment, but not age at diagnosis, affected the abundance of a number of these proteins. When controlling for patient age, we confirmed that early neurodegenerative proteins and proteins associated with inflammation were increased in the JOP patient group. This study provides a more complete picture of the blood proteome in JOP and illustrates that subtle alterations are present in the JOP patient population, and are most likely caused by symptomatic treatments. No I don't, but I can't say I've seen many con stories that weren't geared toward attracting women, or at least heavily containing women. I love comics, and I try to read stuff all over the place, but I try to avoid con stories, because it's usually aimed at women. It's not that con stories aren't about comics (as mentioned, I love comics), but they tend to be very specialized. When I pick up a comic book (or look for a particular comic book in a used store), I want to get a lot of stuff in one
