Does "softlink" mean "symbolic link" in a closed-source software? In Arch Linux documentation, I found the following information: you can also create a softlink instead by passing a directory and the name of the link in the same command.

(softlinks are a different type of link from hardlinks, which can only reference files that already exist, and they can use symbolic links internally, too. They are used to link in files when generating the binary with a file called them) Could anyone please explain what are softlinks in this context? A: It means a file on a device which just references another file by a name. When you run the command `ln -s /some/name /some/hardlink` then you can see `/some/name`, and when you `cat /some/hardlink` you see `/some/name`. It's kind of like a symbolic link, but with a minor difference: As we all know, a hard link only refers to an existing file in the file system, and then if `/some/hardlink` is deleted so will the file. The name `/some/name` is just a pointer to another file, and still exists even if the file in `/some/hardlink` is deleted. The present invention relates to a method of and apparatus for fabricating photosensitive sheets in a printer using a photoelectric recording system. There is now available a photoelectric recording system which comprises a sheet or sheets of photosensitive material which are selectively exposed by a beam of light, a photoelectric read-out device for reading out the exposed photosensitive material and a recording device which reproduces the read-out image. According to this system, an original image can be reproduced with high fidelity. Thus, in U.S. Pat. No. 4,225,159 there is disclosed a photoelectric recording system which comprises a photosensitive sheet containing a mixture of a leuco dye and an electron donating substance. When the photosensitive sheet is exposed to light, the leuco dye is oxidized and the electron donating substance
