Tryptophan, a precursor of serotonin, is derived from decarboxylation of L-phenylalanine by the enzyme phenylalanine hydroxylase. The enzyme catalyzes the following reaction in which oxygen is incorporated into the tetrahydropteridine ring of the cofactor bipterin and onto the aromatic side chain of L-phenylalanine (Chen, T. Y.; Huang, C. C. Adv. Enzymol. 1968, 25, 241-349). ##STR1## Inhibition of phenylalanine hydroxylase results in increased concentrations of L-phenylalanine and L-tryptophan and therefore results in the synthesis of serotonin, a neurotransmitter believed to be implicated in depression, psychosis, mental retardation, migraine, and other neurological disorders. Thus there is a substantial need for inhibitors of this enzyme and antidepressant/antipsychotic agents. Numerous biochemical and physiological investigations have shown that serotonin has several important functions and that it may be abnormally present or unavailable in a number of disease states. These studies have led to new approaches to mental disease, such as the treatment of depression, which are based on correcting any abnormality of, or supplemental addition to, the level of serotonin or its metabolites 6a5afdab4c
