This article is more than a year old. Humans can no longer be fooled by songbirds, scientists have shown. A study published this week in the journal Current Biology reveals that humans have a particular response when certain songs are played back to them. The researchers used systems to mimic the process of listening to and watching a bird sing. "Humans and other species are fundamentally tuned to the physical properties of the environment,” said study author Daniël Lakens, a psychologist at KU Leuven in Belgium. “We’re very good at detecting sounds, at listening to the nature of the sounds around us.” Scientists have long believed that while humans perceive birdsong differently from other sounds, they still have an instant reaction to it — a musical response, Lakens said. “Listening to something is a basic form of categorizing information,” Lakens said. “So while the birdsong is processed in a different way, it triggers a very specific response.” Testing conditions Scientists wanted to see whether that assumption held true under conditions that mimicked what birds experience. To do that, the team built a system that would play them recordings of a song in different ways, and asked humans to judge whether the new noises were real or not. The researchers observed how reaction times changed depending on how different the sounds were from the original birdsong. In one experiment, which involved playing back the song, the scientists added a specific set of sounds to the birdsong, which they called “modulations.” They reasoned that if a songbird was singing in the presence of certain noises, for example, it could change its song to conceal them. Lakens and his colleagues wanted to see if people would recognize those modulations as fake when played back to them. A second experiment compared reaction times when listening to the birdsong without any modulation, or with different types of modulation, for one second, then stopping it. The scientists found that humming was much faster than any of the other types of modulations they tested. This 'humming

Mar 7, 2012 A nice tool to create a simple virus in a few seconds. It's very easy and complete. Just fill in the fields and click on "Create Virus". A. Jul 11, 2012 Don't expect any damage to your computer from this tool. Because it uses simple instructions for creating viruses. May 27, 2012 A simple tool to create a Virus. The simple interface of the tool allows you to access the virus creation process. The torrent file contains the folder including all the softwares that is all need to create the virus. About JPS Virus Maker -- JPS Virus Maker 3.0 is a Tool that has been created by some friends who like to make a program or a tool. -- The virus creation process is easy and very fast and can be done in a few seconds, just select the type of virus and then click on "Create" -- There is a nice interface that shows you the options for the
