Track a Minute is a straightforward and easy-to-use software application that enables you to track time for multiple tasks within projects. It sports a few powerful options that are easy to tinker with. Windows startup integration The installation procedure doesn't take a long time to finish. However, you should know that Track a Minute offers to make file associations and it automatically integrates itself in the system boot sequence (this option cannot be disabled). Once launched, the tool creates a new icon in the system tray area for quick access. Rudimentary-looking UI with intuitive options As far as the interface is concerned, Track a Minute doesn't put too much emphasis on looks, preferring to focus on functionality instead. You can add a new job by specifying the ID number, client project and details, a new task by establishing the title and details, as well as a new time by indicating the project, title, start time and date, along with elapsed time. Create projects, tasks and times The elapsed time for each task is recorded on the bottom part of the screen. All you have to do is select a task from the list, and click a button to start timing it. Aside from stopping, it's possible to pause and resume time. Furthermore, Track a Minute lets you edit properties for projects, tasks and times, export information to file and import it later or another computer running Track a Minute, print data, aggregate or merge selected times, check for software updates, as well as modify the default data path and elapsed time format. Evaluation and conclusion Everything worked smoothly in our tests, and the operating system didn't freeze, crash or prompt error messages. It left a small footprint on system resources, thanks to the fact that it required low CPU and memory to work properly. Although it may seem like a rudimentary software application that doesn't integrate an option for removing its entry from the Windows autostart sequence, Track a Minute provides the necessary and suffice features for keeping track of time for various projects with different tasks. For example, a database administrator may backup a database when the database is down or taken offline. The database administrator may also replicate (or replicate) the database to one or more additional databases on a different server. Typically, the database administrator manually determines the backup or the replication. For example, the database administrator may manually determine when to perform a backup or a replication of the database, and may manually determine what information should be backed up or replicated. Thus, the database administrator may increase the workload for the database administrator.Q: How to politely renege on a "let's talk" you never agreed to? Context I went on a date with a guy last week. During the date, he revealed a bit of personal information that I had already heard, but without thinking on it I had never come to ask about it directly from him. I guess the answer to that was yes. He then asked me if I wanted to come talk about it face to face. Of course I said yes, but I also do not want to "
