What's New In?

Search engines typically rank search result pages in an attempt to convey the most relevant and useful information to a user. For example, in the context of a search engine, it is important for a search engine to quickly identify relevant web pages, and rank them in such a way that the most relevant pages come to the top of the list so that they are more likely to be selected by a user. In particular, if a user conducts a search query in a search engine, the search engine ranks the top results based on relevance and returns a list of web pages to the user. The user then must individually review each of the web pages and determine which web pages are relevant to the query. In some instances, a user may need to read numerous web pages to find the relevant web page or pages. This process can be time consuming and overwhelming.
