Discovered by a group of high school students from the Dafna school in Israel, the remains are estimated to be about 32,000 years old. The find is ancient enough to be included in the current Anthropological-Archaeological excavation season in Israel. The find is significant because of the remarkable state of preservation of the skeleton, which archaeologists assume was buried in a shallow grave in the ground. This greatly increases the chances of actually recovering historical documents from the skeletons, such as textiles and jewelry. Find out more from National Geographic Magazine.
