Negative affect regulation difficulties might be an important source of vulnerability to some anxiety disorders, and according to the goal-directed perspective of emotion regulation, these difficulties might be related to the specific goals individuals choose to pursue. In the present study, we examined the association between patients' sexual goals (i.e., the perceived importance of engaging in sexual activities) and two types of avoidance goals: problem avoidance goals (PA goals; that is, avoiding situations in which problems or potential problems might occur) and social anxiety (SA) goals (i.e., avoiding social situations perceived to be threatening). The sample consisted of 191 women with DSM-IV-defined anxiety disorders, who were recruited from outpatient clinics. Sexual goals were assessed via self-report. Problem avoidance and social anxiety goals were measured using the Goal Attainment Scaling (GAS) measure. Results revealed that avoidance goals, particularly SA goals, but not PA goals, were associated with higher levels of sexual distress. In a mediation model, we found that sexual distress mediated the association between 6a5afdab4c
