newspaper that is usually of a larger size, and often considered to be among the highest quality and most serious of its kind. Strictly speaking, this is incorrect, as broadsheet newspapers must technically be no larger than a dictionary and no smaller than the smallest broadsheet, the twenty-eightpage broadsheet Daily Telegraph. (This is not to be confused with tabloid newspapers which are usually smaller and more tabloid-like than a broadsheet, but must not be smaller than a dictionary.) The terms may be applied to all papers which are published weekly or more frequently, and are usually with more space allocated to the news sections and less space on the op-ed and advertising sections. This normally means that the broadsheet will be longer and wider than a tabloid, and the latter will be smaller and less wide. The term "broadsheet" is a shortened form of the terms broadsheet and newspaper, as most readers of traditional broadsheet newspapers do not read the ads. The term "wallpaper" is short for "wallmounted paper"; this is the original use of the term in newspapers, where the paper is mounted so that it can be hung from a wall. From the late 20th century onwards, the term has acquired a new meaning, referring to a sheet of newsprint commonly used to wallpaper walls and other interior surfaces around
