Glandular mesenchymal chondrosarcomas of the uterus are rare, representing only 0.5% of all uterine neoplasms. Only 1% of these tumours are localized in the cervix and less than 5% in the endometrium. We report a case of localized mesenchymal chondrosarcoma arising in the endometrium with clinical and histological characteristics of uterine-cervical and vaginal-rectal localization. The origin of the tumour was confirmed by immunohistochemistry and fluorescent in situ hybridisation. The diagnosis was suspected on the basis of the simultaneous presence of cervical, vaginal and endometrial chondrosarcomas with similar histological and immunohistochemical features. Both the endometrial chondrosarcoma and the cervical chondrosarcomas showed the typical immunophenotype, with positivity for vimentin, S100, SMA, SOX-9 and cytokeratins (CKAE1/3, CAM5.2). One of the vaginal-rectal chondrosarcomas showed focal immunoreactivity for cytokeratin and desmin. This case underlines the necessity of including uterine mesenchymal chondrosarcomas in the differential diagnosis of endometrial and cervical chondrosarcomas and suggests that there may be a common lineage of genital tract mesenchymal chond e79caf774b

This period of innovation has been explained through a number of different perspectives, but to date, has been dated by no more than a decade at a time and a few key periods. The sheer amount of technological innovation that occurred during this period of innovation is astounding. By the middle of the 19th century, the machine had been developed to such a sophistication level that it was possible to manufacture mass consumer products.
