Sponsor Senator panel calls for forensic science reforms A committee studying the financial industry said Wednesday that it wants improvements made to the way forensics experts are appointed to federal watchdogs such as the Securities and Exchange Commission. Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee Chairman John Rockefeller (D-W.Va.) said the fight over appointments to the oversight panel highlights the need to change how federal regulators oversee Wall Street and other industries. "Too often, government regulators, regulators who owe their jobs to the public, are subservient to the industries they regulate," he said at a hearing on reforming the financial industry. "They're not the enemy. They're a natural part of our political culture and we need them." Rockefeller was one of about a dozen senators and a few ex-senators testifying at Wednesday's hearing. The panel is holding the hearing as Congress considers whether to extend the terms of regulators and appointees. Over the years, the number of agents who have worked for the federal agencies has fallen to an average of less than two per agency. That number has become a crucial issue as more agencies are implementing programs and projects that require numerous experts to take part in their design and implementation. "The best thing that could come out of the hearings would be a more centralized, more effective arrangement for the appointment of these regulators," said Mark White, a former top aide to ex-Sen. Charles Grassley (R-Iowa), who today represents financial industry clients on Capitol Hill. He's also a member of the Scientific Advisory Board, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission's watchdog on forensic science. Among those testifying Wednesday was White House budget director Jeffrey Zients, who also is a former staffer for Grassley. "Just as we would have rightly questioned the appointment process of the SEC at the time of its creation in 1934, we should question the appointment process for the CFPB today," said Grassley, referring to the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, the other agency set up by the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform Act. Zients and Rockefeller both said the SEC's Forensic Science Center should be turned into a fully independent agency. The center is part of the SEC's enforcement division, which is charged with investigating securities fraud. Zients said the division often lags in catching up to the advancing understanding of how to catch fraudsters. The Center of Excellence for Financial Forensics, a joint operation between the SEC and Department
