Polling places closed, the March 1 deadline arrives with little fanfare in Pennsylvania. Under State law, only one in two precincts are required to be open for early voting. But the state's In-person Absentee Ballot Program is a bigger deal to voters than early voting. Absentee voting is by far the biggest elections-related polling place this cycle, with many more people signing up to vote absentee than early in Florida. In Pennsylvania, one in six voters cast an absentee ballot in 2010, a number driven largely by the cost of getting to the polls. That's about twice as high as in 2002, when only one in eight voters used absentee ballots, according to the Pennsylvania Department of State. Early voting for presidential and state elections is usually a choice of either casting a ballot at a polling place or doing it in the privacy of your own home. But in Pennsylvania, only one in two precincts have to be open for early voting, meaning the other precincts can be quieter. Some counties have decided to hold voting on only Tuesdays and Wednesdays, and some issue requests to leave their polling places open on Saturdays, the only weekday when people are expected to be at work. But in other counties, the polls are closed on Saturdays, with rare exceptions. Voters can only vote absentee for state or federal elections in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and several counties on the western shore of the state. But absent voters in Philadelphia can vote absentee for municipal elections and the county's general election.
