For the increasing numbers of new technology implants, a number of potential ethical issues are raised. This article is the first of a series of three examining the ethics of cardiac implantable electronic devices (CIED), specifically the pacemaker. The three issues examined are: (1) diagnosing patients, (2) end of life, and (3) risks of multiple device implants. Relevant literature was searched using MEDLINE, PubMed, and Google Scholar to find relevant articles published since 2004. The most salient arguments are examined in regard to each of these issues. The area of safety regarding potential hazards has been poorly addressed in the literature. Two studies suggest that reducing the number of leads in a pacemaker is potentially hazardous, and a third study suggests that multiple device implants are potentially hazardous. Our general concern is that patient safety is sacrificed at the risk of unnecessarily prolonging life. The number of deaths associated with the implanted device is small and is not equivalent to death by natural causes. Nevertheless, it may be considered unethical to bring about a conscious prolongation of life at a high morbidity and mortality rate.Intentional injury and unintentional poisoning due to drugs: time trends in self-reported drug related mortality, 1984-1994. Alcohol, tobacco, and illegal drugs are among the most frequent causes of unintentional injury and intentional injury. Trends in drug related injury are highly variable, and whether this has changed over time is not well described. We used the US National Center for Health Statistics' multiple cause-of-death files (1984-1994) to estimate yearly rates of unintentional drug related poisoning and intentional drug related injury.

In addition, we examined rates of drug use and drug related diagnosis by gender, urban-rural status and for intentional drug related injury and unintentional drug related poisoning. Unintentional drug related poisonings showed a highly significant increase from 1984-1994 (from 0.4 to 1.4/100,000). For unintentional drug related poisoning there were no regional differences; however, drug use rates varied by gender and age. Intentional drug related injuries also showed an increase from 1984-1994 (

Ethernet networks are widely used. Typically, Ethernet networks employ a system of cables or twisted pair lines for transmitting data between various nodes. In a typical cable-based Ethernet network, Ethernet data is transmitted in the form of data packets. Each Ethernet data packet includes a preamble comprising a pattern of bits that are commonly used to establish that a data packet is being transmitted. The preamble is followed by a packet of data. In addition to using a preamble, Ethernet uses a cyclic redundancy check (CRC) based on a polynomial that is a function of the data in the packet as a data integrity check. The CRC is a mechanism for detecting accidental errors in the data. The presence or absence of a CRC in an Ethernet data packet is determined at the receiving node by comparing the

CRC of the data packet to a pre-calculated CRC. The pre-calculated CRC value is determined from the polynomial used in the CRC and the data of the Ethernet packet. A mismatch between the CRC of the data packet and the pre-calculated CRC value indicates an error. Ethernet systems typically use a Media Independent Interface (MII) for transmitting and receiving Ethernet data packets. The MII provides an electrical interface between the physical layer and the data link layer. One prior art data loss detection method is based on whether or not a data packet is received. In this prior art method, when the CRC calculation of an Ethernet packet is wrong, the Ethernet packet is not received. The prior art method then assumes that data loss has occurred because the CRC calculation is incorrect. This prior art method for detecting data loss uses active probing, where the receiving node actively transmits a data packet requesting to receive data. One difficulty with such prior art active probing methods is that active probing may be undesirably time consuming, particularly when large amounts of data are to be transmitted. In addition, active probing is undesirably sensitive to noise and other environmental effects. A second problem with such prior art active probing methods is that they do
