Field of the Invention This invention relates to a dry etching method of, for example, SiO₂ used in a film such as a SiO₂ insulating film in a semiconductor device or a micromachine. 2. Description of the Related Art Dry etching is indispensable for the formation of an insulating film used in a film such as a SiO₂ insulating film in a semiconductor device or a micromachine. The SiO₂ insulating film, for example, is formed using a CVD method or a PVD method. A polishing method of performing chemical etching in the step of dry etching is also used. The processes of forming a thin film are performed in many steps in the manufacture of the SiO₂ insulating film. Recently, to improve the properties of the SiO₂ insulating film used in semiconductor devices, the use of a film containing a small amount of impurities, an optimum composition of the film, etc. is under investigation. As a result, the development of the dry etching technique which can be used to etch the films at high selectivity has been advanced. A dry etching method of wet etching an SiO₂ insulating film by hydrogen fluoride (HF) with high selectivity is known as the above-mentioned dry etching method. In the prior art, however, the selectivity between the SiO₂ insulating film and the underlying film (mask) is sometimes low. In other words, the process margin in the above-mentioned HF method is low. To improve the selectivity between the SiO₂ insulating film and the underlying film, various dry etching methods have been studied. As an example, the use of the so-called reactive gas in combination with a noble gas is known. The use of the reactive gas in combination with the noble gas reduces a corrosive gas and thereby the selectivity can be improved. Further, the use of the so-called reaction gas in combination with the noble gas reduces the influence of the sputter gas,
