The use of the weapons was first raised by Mayor Denis Coderre on Monday, during a meeting with Montreal police officers. Coderre's comments came after a day during which police conducted two major raids in Montreal, in addition to searching homes and businesses linked to the two brothers accused of killing a soldier and a Quebec man linked to radical Islam. On Sunday, police searched a parcel in Sainte-Anne-de-Bellevue that belonged to one of the two brothers, Mohamed and Abdelaziz, the other being a known extremist. Coderre told reporters he wants to see a report on the use of Tasers by Montreal police in the two raids, which are the first in the city in over a decade. "I would like to see a big safety study that looks at what happened in other big investigations," he said. "The use of the Taser has to be revised and rewritten," Coderre said, adding that he wants police to be more cautious when using the weapons. "When I see that, in other investigations, there are Taser firings that were false positive," he said. "The greatest concern would be for the families who have lost loved ones." While Tasers can be used for less lethal reasons, Montreal police say they were used in both raids by officers pursuing the men suspected of involvement in the two deadly bombings. Police announced on Tuesday night that a third Montreal mosque had been searched as part
