She has been asked to come into the house to sit down while I was cleaning and she told me she would rather not come in because she is afraid of cats. It was important for her that she do this job but she did not want to. Does she have a chance of getting over this fear if she is older? Answer: I don't think that age is necessarily the issue. As you pointed out, she has been asked to come in, to clean the house while you are here, so that she can do a job she has been told she can do. This is a task she should probably be doing at this age anyway, but her current avoidance behavior is creating a barrier to completing the work. She may have a hard time remembering to do the job if she doesn't have a place to go and "feel safe." I agree with you, that eventually it would be nice to have your daughter's house cleaned, so maybe a compromise could be to have her come in after dark, when it's quieter and she can see the cat and feel safer. Please know that in order to receive mental health counseling or therapy, you or your daughter will need to access your insurance or have health insurance that will pay for treatment. Generally, there are no programs that provide mental health services to children or teenagers under the age of 18, but your child can receive counseling in school under the care of a teacher or a school counselor. It's important to know that it's OK to be afraid of something or to feel bad about something - like being afraid of a cat - but that there are things that are good to be afraid of or to have empathy for. For instance, when you are afraid of spiders, the best thing to do is to handle them with care and not to touch them or run away. You need to do this even if you're afraid. Likewise, if you are afraid of snakes, you don't want to handle them or run away. You need to learn to be brave and handle them when you need to. Remember that your daughter doesn't have to go anywhere or do anything if she is afraid. If she doesn't want to go to
