About Playism Playism is a Japan-based publisher that was established in 1999. During that time, we published over 200 titles and have exported 20 titles to other regions. Our internal R&D team is mainly developers with a strong background in software development. Our internal R&D team is made up of developers who would like to release games that will promote the development of the culture and local economy of Japan and with which they can take pride. Of course, we also publish titles that were developed by overseas companies. At present we are encouraging the globalization of indies and publishers. Please browse our catalog and discover titles that suit your interests.

Social class correlates of life satisfaction in a city sample of adults. The associations of social class with life satisfaction, a measure of subjective well-being, were investigated in a large, representative sample of the City of London. High status individuals were found to have higher levels of life satisfaction than low status individuals, as a result of both greater well-being and less discontent. High status individuals also scored higher on a measure of the negative affectivity of their attitudes. The results confirm previous findings based on smaller samples and other dependent variables and suggest that the mechanisms underlying these differences remain constant and can
