What's New Change shortcut keys and... IPortView is a tiny, straightforward and highly intuitive application whose only purpose is to reveal your current local and IP address. It does so by showing a small notification balloon from the system tray area. Otherwise, it sits there silently without distracting you from your regular PC activities. View your local and public IP address The program is not designed to help you change your IP address, so you'll have to resort to another tool for that purpose, like X-Proxy, Hotspot Shield or CyberGhost VPN. However, you can run it alongside such an app to easily get a glimpse of your current IP address. Simple setup and systray accessibility Installing IPortView is a seamless job that shouldn't give you any trouble. It gets sent to the taskbar notifications area as soon as it's launched, and you can left click the icon to find out your local and public IP address. Find open ports and expand shortened URLs By opening the right-click menu you can copy any of the two addresses to the Clipboard, change the interface language, refresh the addresses, find out if a specific port is open, as well as use a simple tool that expands a short URL, revealing its original form, and allowing you to copy it to the Clipboard. There are no other notable options available here. Evaluation and conclusion Unsurprisingly, the application had minimal impact on computer performance in our tests, running on low CPU and memory. It didn't hang, crash or display error messages. Although it doesn't feature rich options, IPortView is a

I'm fairly new to Erlang and OS X and so I'm just trying to get to grips with the model. As I understand it, Erlang on OS X is built-in, but I'm not sure how to tell if it is "ready" to be used, and whether or not I need to install something extra. I could see an OS X system having the base Erlang environment via apt-get install erlang-base, but it seems to me there should be a way to more quickly check if the OS is setup. Is there?
