American "comfort women" at the 2014 Nippon Fukujinkai Conference at the University of Chicago. One of the last speakers was the Taegu representative, Kenji Nagahara, who told the crowd that the Anti-Comfort Women movement has an important message for young people today. He asked the younger generation to uphold the principle that "people should not suffer a wrong done to them by another." My heart sank. I feel a sick despair at the fact that, at this very moment, the Japanese government is trying to force former sexual slaves to put their memories behind them. The government's decision to cancel survivor's trips to the parliament and the Foreign Correspondents Club of Japan and its proposal to expand the deadline for "painful memories" is just the latest act in a persistent public campaign against their struggle. I am the executive director of the Korean Comfort Women Foundation. It has been 10 years since I was released from prison. The day I came home to Korea was my reunion with my mother and father, who cried as they embraced. My family and I have been living together ever since, and raising our three children together. Our family is the living truth to what the Japanese government has done. But in Japan, some politicians are still denying that it happened. Because of that, the people of Korea and Japan, and myself as a Korean comfort woman who survived Japanese military sexual violence, are reminded of our history constantly. We are not even allowed to meet without permission from the Japanese government. And when we do meet, there are many Korean comfort women and their supporters who block the entrance to avoid arguments. But I and those who have suffered the
