Q: WCF Caching We use WCF to do data communication between two applications. The objects returned by the WCF service are routed into a cache. Each client generates its own session and caches the result. We are using the WCF Data Service and the K2 Cache server. The data service is for all users of the application. It is also for the internal business users. The internal users get most of the things from this service, but each client (client of the business users) generates its own session to access the service, and each user has their own cache on K2.

WebbyDwCaching.WebbyDwCache2, WebbyDwCaching net.tcp://localhost:8999/Cache The K2 server is also configured to create sessions for each client. When we ran the application, we had a few problems. For the first time, a client got a user object from the cache. But after it sent the request to the service, a network problem caused the service to return null to that client, since the cache already had the user object in its cache. After that problem was resolved, another problem appeared. For some clients, after sending their requests, the cache got refreshed, but they did not. We also do not have any defined Policies on the cache server. We are currently working on resolving the problem. But we need to
