What's new in Rabbit Island:

, Maine Rabbit Island is a town on the coast of Maine, located in York County, Maine, United States. The population was 691 at the 2010 census. History Rabbit Island is the largest island in the state of Maine. It is connected to the mainland by Beaver Harbor (a harbor), which is a wide inlet in this connection. It is known for a controversial herring fishery during the late 19th century and early 20th century, which caused the demise of the local Indian tribe. The island got its name from the fact that Island's several islands consist mainly of large boulders. Fishery Rabbit Island was once a relatively important herring fishery. It also once had an increased number of birds nesting on the islands, particularly sea ducks. By the 1920s, the herring had declined in intensity, something the islanders accepted knowing that it was a somewhat natural process. Aided by the harsh winter weather, the sea birds that nest on Rabbit Island, as well as at other islands along Beaver Harbor, tend to remain at their nests from spring to summer, and winter to spring, with the winter being longer than spring. In the winter months of 1953 to 1956, a study was conducted to determine the nesting habits of the common terns (Sterna hirundo) and barnacles (family Scorpaenidae) on Rabbit Island. The terns continue to live on the island all year. Archaeology Archaeological sites such as the Wessagusset Island occupation site were on Rabbit Island at least 300 years before the town of Deer Isle and the main town of Deer Isle. The Wessagusset site consists of a ditched pit that was inhabited from around 500 to 700 AD. It has been studied by a series of archeology finds by Dr. Lawrence W. Hendrickson. It is largely because of the archeological research (while on the island before the herring fishery decline) by Lawrence Hendrickson that allowed the creation of the first tourism focus in all of Maine. In November 1979, a duct of the site was examined. This was when Thomas Kerlin of the U.S. Fish & Wildlife Service and Hendrickson were on the island; Kerlin said that the duct or tunnel was "a natural funnel for the eels and menhaden that had trapped in the chamber." He also said that the ducts were large enough for a small child to
