As, for the benefit of the question, I believe the simulation is experimental and not fully/usefully/reliably proven to be "safe", yes, you should use it. As for why you should not start a normal simulation in a computer where someone else (with malicious intent) has access, such a simulation is experimental and certainly requires verification of results (to test the theory that it doesn't crash) before your results are trustworthy. How should such a normal simulation be done? [This answer is rambling. Continue reading from top to bottom, if you desire.] [Deleted] is a valid answer and everyone should know how to perform such a normal simulation. In the end, a normal simulation should be possible in the strictest sense. If it's not, then you can't trust the simulation. [Deleted] is not valid. Either you do a simulation (which validates the theory), or you don't. It's not valid to not do a simulation. Q: Converting a 'X' and 'Y' coordinate string to 3D coordinate matrix in python I have a column of strings that is formatted as: "X,Y,Z". I want to break that out into a 3D matrix that looks something like: [X,Y,Z,X,Y,Z,X,Y,Z,....]. That is, where for every three lines that make up the matrix, the first letter of every string is the x coordinate and the last three lines of the string are the z coordinate. I have no idea how to approach this in python. My first thought would be to convert the string into an ndarray and then process that, but this seems to be a pretty extensive for loop that would take forever. Is there a better way to get the output I'm looking for? A: You can use np.split with a call to transpose: In [11]: np.split(s,3,'X')[:,1::-1].t Out[11]: array([[1., 2., 3., 4., 5., 6., 7., 8., 9., 10.], [1., 2., 3., 4., 5., 6 0cc13bf012
