You are a bird-bee. The small bee gather nectar and do not notice that the evening comes, and that the weather begins to deteriorate, and is far from home. Help the bee to get to the house, avoid terrible predators and terrible weather conditions. You game, you will have several lives for which you will be able to set a new record and try to take the small bee home to the family. What's New - Sweet bee-bird, butterfly and any other birds is added to the game How to Play: - Touch each creature of the game, play, get a point, and try to complete all the tasks set in the game. • Complete daily tasks for additional points. • Tap the screen when you want to increase your movement speed for less taps. • Record each score for each stage of the game. • Use the arrow keys and touch screen to move the bird. • The game will increase the speed of the game if you continue to play. Recommended for players who like to solve puzzles as "less taps", but the game is also suitable for players who like to play a bit of action. If the game is too difficult for you, there's a "Puzzle Mode" that you can also play. If you encounter a problem, please contact us at [email protected] Important This game contains in-game purchases. You can disable in-app purchases by adjusting your device settings. TELEPHONE is a trademark of Telefónica S.A. Who buys a new phone has to pay for it, and we still will have credits! It's just that we will be able to use them in other ways (you'll be able to see more details on mobal.com).Q: implementing atomic increment and decrement in c The following code has the following semantics: (a) if x and y point to the same object, increment y and return 0; (b) if x and y point to the same object, increment y and return 1; (c) if x and y point to different objects, increment x and return 0; (d) otherwise, zero x, zero y, and return 0; What is the best way to implement this in C? I have attempted the following, which works, but seems inelegant. #define inc(x, y) ((*y)++ , ((

What's new:

beerd leaver is an abstract urban art project by Dutch design studio Beerd & Plooi, conceived by Victor Plooi and commissioned by New York-based partners Andrew Berman and Don Troop. Beerd leaver was an open call for behavioural games or experiments which were submitted to an architectural office. The act of writing a personal letter and leaving it in a place in the public realm in a collaborative group, was a form of communication and a stress test for the boundaries between public and private, the personal and the collective, and idea and form. As part of the work an 'arrival date' was left in a public space where people could leave their own, anonymous 'leaves' on the same date. The left over letters were then collected, sorted and displayed at the studio. The results of this social experiment are now exhibited in a gallery space, Delft Festival of Photography, that the studio has curated. Urban phenomena Traditionally, letters were used as a form of mass communication: in the urban network, the possibilities of interaction were diminishing in parallel to the increasing (urban) size of the city. The telephone and the post office have the potential to alter this. In this post-traditional society, the modern letter is then bringing about, in a non-invasive way, a reification of the circulation of information through correspondence, in a specific time and place. This call letter leaves the sensibility of that leaf on the post box. It is thought that the arrival date and the time it was put there (say: the morning and the time of its arrival) add an extra layer to the communication. So that this leaf or telegram or twopenny postcard then literally got accompanied by a date and a time. So they travel out of the city and throughout the landscape of Europe. (And also, probably beyond that). The physical and the metaphorical This project is a volume of commissions; a form of humorous, commiserative installation work: the work is a process of discovery that is born out of a conceit, that is both comme il faut and unacceptable, confined to a gallery wall. That's the fact. Visitors are confronted with this idea, without the necessity to dwell on it and understand where it comes from and what it means. The possibility to do this depends on the visitors and their curiosity (because of the giant size of the city or the giant size of the nation). The project is an approach to
