Maybe next time. Why can we never agree on anything? I was also sort of confused about the switch on the angle of the leg. Should the base of the leg be parallel to the rest of the sheathing, or perpendicular? If you're recreating the back of a home, it should be parallel, but if it's to go on a wall, it should be perpendicular. Or is the wall considered the "floor" and all sheathing is "stair steps"? I had wanted to switch the wall, but you don't have to do that. It would be the same room, no? I think the base of the legs should be perpendicular to the wall also. The sheets at the top of each leg need to be parallel to the wall if they are going to be flush. I'll see if I can pull up a picture of the old base of the walls. Here's one of what I was talking about, for which I really need help. I'm considering maybe redoing this wall to be flush with the floor. The sheets at the top of each leg need to be parallel to the wall if they are going to be flush. While this is true, the other walls can get away with using a corner strip where that line is not important. It's all quite sloppy. I think the base of the legs should be perpendicular to the wall also. The sheets at the top of each leg need to be parallel to the wall if they are going to be flush. Those are not related... the top leg has to be perpendicular to the wall (otherwise, the top of the leg won't be flat), while the bottom leg has to be parallel to the wall (otherwise, the base of the leg won't be flat). BTW, I did the same thing for those stairs, making the wall level instead of angled. _____ The conventional wisdom is that you should always shake a contractor's hand after a job is finished. It's that "duty of loyalty" thing. But it would make more sense for the job to be right the first time. BTW, I did the same thing for those stairs, making the wall level instead of angled. Just made those two photos so you can compare. What I really need help with though is figuring out how to make the other sides flush. I thought that I could just extend this side right over this side
