What's new in Dyflexion:

- An Interactive Adventure Game for Mobile VR! Fight'n'Cradle is the first game that I've ever done, where all of the coding was done using a Unity plugin called the Holodeck SDK. It just saved me so much trouble and money, and I think you'll enjoy it even more than me because of how well it turns out. Before I get to that, please let me introduce myself. My name is Kostas and I'm currently studying Cyber Security and Security Assurance at University. Before that, however, I've worked for well over 10 years across a great variety of industries, from retail, cleaning companies and real-estate companies. In my time, I've learned a lot about customer service, and am still a student of the human side of business. Fight'n'Cradle is one game that I've been wanting to make since I released the Tech Demo project. It's been one of the longest running project out of everything I've done as I've slowly worked my way through making a point and click adventure game in VR. I've tried making a game many times over the years, usually an open world game with the Unity Engine;

however, nothing made me want to do it more than VR. I thought about VR for a long time, looking through Unity developer docs and just playing with Unity to see if it would work. I tried many things before eventually deciding to use the Holodeck SDK to load a pre-rendered scene into a world that the player could walk around. The result is nothing short of amazing; if a person stands 30 inches away from a television screen, moving their head up and down looks like they're floating in the world. If you do happen to see a pop-up, there are some things I've been working on regarding Fight'n'Cradle VR that I'll mention in the coming sections of this article. There's also a little Easter Egg that I've put in the game in the code. Structure of Fight'n'Cradle The player starts off in a safe place. In this safe place are a few pegs, a few ledges, and a bunch of bottles filled with coffee. Players need to pick up each and every one of these items

Do you love life and aren't afraid to test the waters? Does luxury lifestyle sound like your cup of tea? Are you determined to make an independent living out of what you love? If you answered yes to at least one of the above questions, then you have come to the right place. The Middle East is a hotbed of startups and business owners. It is fast-growing, with a tough work ethic, and dynamic. However, while entrepreneurship in this region is on the rise, it is not always simple. Not only will the government impose cumbersome rules and regulations on you, but you'll also have to work under harsh climate conditions. Add to that the the additional obstacle of being a foreigner in a new country, and you know you'll have a lot to overcome. It's no wonder that many people think of starting a business in the Middle East and then simply give up after a few days. They question whether there will be enough opportunities for them to make a living and whether they will be able to cope with
