It's a simple matter of economic law that the only way to play rich and famous, well, rich is with free-to-play. This extends to EA's many online games, of course. Ubisoft's recently acquired Topple tower is the closest thing to the ideal PC-only experience, with its financial system and giant world.

Nevertheless, if you want to be the next superstar of the hardcourt, that route starts at the lower depths of the market. Let's start with the NBA game, MyTeam. With MyTeam, EA attempts to make the long-awaited online experience, along with the improved AI, without the matchmaking conundrums that plague other games. However, in a world where F2P has dominated the casual market and where the main breadwinner is loot boxes, you can imagine that EA would be doing all it can to keep the player engaged with simple stats, the money system and cosmetic upgrades.

(MyTeam has two different currencies: The first one you earn through the regular course of play, and the second one comes from gambling.) The best players can create their very own teams, and then compare stats to see where they stand. Oh, yes, and MyTeam also has a single-player mode called Season mode. You play as an owner and try to win the championship. Each season has a two-month campaign, and you get to take your franchise to Europe and play in the regular season and playoffs.

The real meat of it, though, are the five-on-five games. You can play against other owners, or you can invite other to challenge you in a team league. Sounds basic, but the game has a few more under-the-hood things that make it feel different. One is the matchmaking system, which EA describes as "An innovative new matchmaking system that ensures both competitive gameplay and player continuity by matching the right people to the right games." The system is meant to handle the hundreds of thousands of requests and queries that game publishers like EA receive on a daily basis, but an "integrated online experience" is definitely a nice touch. The NBA game also has an auction house. It's here where you buy players for your team, a la FIFA's Ultimate Team or other live-auction games. You have a pool of funds to spend, and you unlock additional funds as you win games. The end-game is to purchase a player package with everything from your standard jersey to your player of the month. Just about
