Smad4 is a signal transducer of the transforming growth factor beta (TGFbeta) receptor complex and a key regulator of the TGFbeta-mediated signal transduction. Smad4 mutations have been observed in many human cancers, but the clinicopathological significance of the expression of Smad4 in human colorectal cancer has not been well investigated. We examined the expression of Smad4 in 101 colorectal cancers using an immunohistochemical technique. Smad4 was expressed in 54 of 101 colorectal cancers (52.4%), but was not expressed in normal colorectal mucosa (0/13). The expression of Smad4 in rectal cancer was significantly higher than that in colon cancer (P = 0.0097). Smad4 expression was significantly correlated with the Dukes' stage (P = 0.0001), lymphatic invasion (P = 0.0004), and vascular invasion (P = 0.0017). Patients with Smad4-positive cancer survived significantly longer than those with Smad4-negative cancer (P = 0.0011). There was no correlation between Smad4 expression and postoperative recurrence, distant metastasis, or the site of recurrence. These results suggest that Smad4 expression may be related to the pathological stage and the prognosis of human colorectal cancer.
