Tryst is a complex strategy hybrid inspired by strategy games like Warcraft 3 and Command & Conquer 3, with action based on the StarCraft 2 game engine. The game takes place in the years after the war has ended, where the player assumes the role of a very young general. Using a simple yet powerful development engine, the player is given the opportunity to alter the landscape through colonization, natural catastrophe, and trade agreements. These decisions are what actually form the basis of the game play. This game was created to appeal to both the casual and competitive audience. The game features a campaign that has multiple levels of difficulty, hotseat multiplayer, and a singleplayer game mode called the 'Maze Mode'. The central plot of the game is to take control of one of four civilizations and attempt to conquer and build your way to greatness. However, to build your way to greatness requires you to be trained first. To train your race, you must build your training ground. In the normal game, you choose one of four civilizations and begin the game with one of two levels of initial training and one of four different starting buildings. Once you train your race, you can begin training soldiers for your race. When you are ready, you can send out your armies to conquer other players. Be careful though, as if you are too aggressive, players will use your advancements against you and cause you to lose all of your advancements. However, if you manage to learn from your mistakes, eventually you will be able to create your own advancements. During the conquest phase, other players have armies which you must use to take control of cities. Your armies can take control of other players' cities through a variety of different ways, including if the army blockades the city. Each player has a certain number of resources which can be spent in order to purchase and upgrade advancements, and can also be used to improve technologies which can be researched later on for improvements. Once your team has completed the conquest phase, you can set up defenses for protection. While not controlling a city, you are still vulnerable to attack from the other players. If you suffer any damage, you must take that amount of damage back from your team and can not recover for a set period of time. Your team can also use the damage taken to upgrade their advancements. When you are fully upgraded, you may start another map, choosing a new race, and begin the same process over again. The game also offers hotseat multiplayer. In this mode you and your opponent play a

A week ago I started a campaign for IPv6 to take over from IPv4 in the internet. Further on I tweeted that some ISPs are starting to integrate IPv6 so I thought I should finally write about it!

1. The State of IPv6 at the end of 2013 was amazing According to Wikipedia, the Internet Protocol Version 6 (IPv6) was introduced in June 1997. As of 2013 the rate of adoption has reached 9.3 per 100 people. As that doesn't mean that most people are using it. This is what IPv6 can do! With that said IPv6 will be up and running to all those users of the internet. IPv6 isn't just a better version of IPv4, IPv4 is already starting to show the symptoms of old age. With IPv6 we can expect the internet to become more stable and more dependable over time, we will also get this by minimizing the attack surface on the infrastructure by relying on a "transitive trust system". Also, at the end of 2013 there were 5.3 billion addresses available for IPv6, as there was just 100 years left in the IPv4 address pool we had 140 years left and this doesn't include the 40 B that were assigned after the expiration of the 2004-2012 allocation. At the end of 2013 the Public Internet portion of the address pool, that is Pools 1-242, was fully allocated and ready to provide unique IP addresses to the Internet. Pools 243-254 had 3.1 Billion IPv6 addresses left and Pools 255-319 had 4.3 Billion IPv6 addresses left, this leaves us a pool of IPv6 addresses that is healthy over the next years... This is what IPv6 can do! And let us

I've yet to play this game, but by all accounts this is the perfect fusion of high end graphics, stunning effects and superb visual quality in the most immersive way possible for gaming. It's gorgeous! You probably know that, unless it's your primary medium of technology interaction.⁷ VR Focus The current screen door effect is an awesome game mechanic and I would love to see it expanded into many more games. 3 reviewers — over half the number of full reviews — have provided a score over 8, indicating the game is very well done. I am a very big fan of Blood & Truth, so I was well aware of what to expect as a consumer of the game. Yes, it's a skill-based shooter and will be more of a challenge than most shooters. However, I like my shooters to be difficult. I also appreciate players making it challenging by their own mistakes or laziness. It's part of the fun for me! However, I truly believe that VRFocus users are a better gauge of reviews as they provide more real-world examples of the player's experiences. The difference is that VRFocus provides 360-degree videos and photos of the game, which allows consumers to see how to get around the game, and how to shoot, dodge, and duck to get into positions to make successful shots. We also have video interviews with developers, industry professionals, and leading VRFocus contributors, as well as our in-depth news coverage, which is the best source for all of the gaming news and trends, all of which factor into your score. With a review score averaging out to 7.3, is this the game I was hoping for? Not exactly. Let's take a look at the good, the bad, and the ugly. Good Usability VRFocus reviews score this game highly for its usability. Whether you are a first-time VR gamer, or an experienced veteran, it will be easy to use the system and get into the game right away. There are many scenarios where gameplay can get repetitive, especially when you are being forced to kill groups of zombies, which are very predictable in their movements and actions. However, the developers have provided a built-in way to skip between targets for you, and it's extremely useful for practice. In case you get tired of executing the same scenario over and over again please let me know. A: I came up with a solution using access rules by checking for the columns, although I don't think there is any way of updating the datatype: Method 1

class Element extends CakeElement { public $defaultFields = array( 'name' => 'Varchar(255)', 'id' => 'Int(4)', 'url' =>
'Varchar(255)' ); public $rules = array( array('field' =>
'name', 'label' => __('Name of Element')), array('field' =>
'url', 'label' => __('URL')), array('field' => 'id', 'label' => __('ID')), ); } Element.php Model $this->belongsTo('User'); User.php Model $this->hasMany('Element', array('foreignKey' => 'user_id')); I can generate the rows through a find query to the Elements table. I use the Element.url to find the Element's url and display it in an edit dialog for further editing.
