I have a server that runs on CentOS Linux and IIS 6.0 and I can upload files to the web server no problems. My issue is that we move a lot of these files to be processed locally, and I have to log them in an audit log and move them back to the server if they are not used. There are many files, so I want to use a batch process to move them back to the server, as it would be difficult to do this manually. The files are usually in JPG and TIFF formats and never exceed 2MB each. I have set up an account on our server to track the files opened in IIS. I set the account up as a limited user, and I have it set to record each file opened for a period of time. This works when I manually open a file in the browser, but when I run a script to move files, the account will not register the file. It also does not record files that I send through FTP, e-mail or use in a scheduled task. I have seen it work with other admin accounts, so I don't think it is a permission issue. It seems like IIS closes the file after the batch process moves it, so the account does not record it. Is there a way to get around this so that I can keep track of the files opened with PHP without having to open each one manually? Thank you. Á: We ended up using an external monitoring process written in Perl that sends a report to an email address every night. It does not always run because we have a limited number of processes that run. We also have a limited number of web sites on that server so we do not need to worry about running out of processes. However, when it does run, it sends the files that were not used to our email address and then follows up to see if there are any files that need to be moved. Since we are using a limited number of processes, it is relatively easy to update the script to search through
