book needs English language version and that WO 03/097915 discloses a method of manufacturing a TFT array substrate in which a metal-containing solution is coated on a semiconductor layer with a solution of an organic binder selected from a group consisting of methyl cellulose, methyl cellulose-propylene carbonate, and methyl cellulose-propylene glycol, and baking processes are then performed. The metal-containing solution is dried at the same time. Japanese Laid-Open Patent Publication No. 2004-318662 discloses a method of manufacturing a TFT array substrate in which a photoresist is coated on a substrate with a spin coater, and the photoresist is baked at 150° C. Japanese Laid-Open Patent Publication No. 2001-175900 discloses a method of manufacturing a TFT array substrate in which a photoresist is coated on a substrate with a roller and then hardened, followed by spinning and photolithography, and the photoresist is baked at 150° C. Japanese Laid-Open Patent Publication No. 2005-150021 discloses a method of manufacturing a TFT array substrate in which a photoresist is coated on a substrate with a rotary-stylus coater, and the photoresist is baked at 150° C. A photolithography process for patterning a semiconductor layer is performed on a TFT array substrate. The photolithography process is roughly divided into two processes: a photoresist coating process and a developing process. During the photolithography process, the photoresist is heated to at least 80° C. in a dry condition for drying, with no organic solvents in the photoresist during the photoresist coating process. In general, a drying process performed during the photolithography process is relatively simple in terms of an apparatus. The photoresist is heated in a dry condition to become a film so as to dry it, with no exposure to the air. When a TFT array substrate is formed by using a conventional photolithography process, a process of baking a photoresist coated on a
