Roblox is a sandbox video game development platform, a video game engine that developers can use to build games, and a distributed game development platform with a built-in virtual currency. It is free to play and free for game developers, which means anyone can use the platform to create their own games. In Roblox, users create their own games and gameplay by programming in the Lua programming language. Users may join groups to work together on projects, and can invite their friends to play their games. The dashboard is used to interact with the game world, communicate with other users and manage the Robux items and inventory that players can buy with real money. The Robux are Roblox's game currency. Players may also buy games using real money. The games are developed using the game development platform Unity and published through the Game distribution platform Steam. Roblox has two mobile versions of its platform: Roblox Studio, a game programming tool that also works as a game studio, and Roblox Mobile. The Robux virtual currency can be used to purchase virtual gifts called Robux boxes, unlock items in games, and purchase special virtual items to help users progress in games. Although there are many differences between Roblox and Minecraft, the website is similar in many ways. The main difference is that, in the Minecraft the user is in charge of building and playing around with that build. In the Roblox however, the user makes a build and then puts it out there for others to play. In both Roblox and Minecraft, user builds are represented through an item that can be placed in a "build" in the Minecraft world and in the Roblox world. What have we been doing for the past decade? Roblox was started by David Baszucki and Erik Cassel in 2004. While the founders are long gone, and the website is completely different from what it was, the core principals of Roblox have continued; including the philosophy of allowing people to make their own gaming experiences, by allowing them to program their own games. While having been around for about a decade, Roblox has recently been very active, and seeing this is great, but also, scary. In the past decade, Roblox has done a lot of things that we all enjoyed. How about you? I have personally been playing Roblox since 2014; Roblox for iOS In
